Travel Article

(text) = Context pertaining to the novel

Headline:

Quebec: A region of bustling towns, irresistible food, and unbridled culture.

(Referring to the many locations brought up in the novel where Emile and Gamache would often have breakfast or dinner after investigating)

Sub-Headline:

Is Quebec the place for you? This article will explain why everyone should make plans to come here.

By: Colin A. Morris

Standfirst:

Exploring the bold plains of Quebec and its surrounding cities. There is so much culture and land waiting to be unearthed by travelers of all kinds. Some may be interested in culture or others may be seeking a vacation to get away from the stress of their ordinary and mundane life.

(This is in reference to Three Pines where vacation resorts such as the B&B of Gabri or the rivaling Inn are located)

(But also, of the culture surrounding Quebec City and its founding, and the Father of Quebec, Samuel de Champlain)

Body:

“Over here we have the vast fields named the Plains of Abraham where a war occurred and the French fought the English forces and General James Wolfe fell”, said Tom the tour guide. He continues, “The English had done the impossible. They scaled 150 feet of cliffs and took the French by surprise. The French had underestimated the tactics the English soldiers had at their disposal and it cost them”. Tom went on to explain the founding of Quebec in 1608 by Samuel de Champlain and the mystery surrounding his life, death, and burial.

After hours of touring these great battlefields I was in awe of every subject the tour guide touched on. To think that one mistake could cost the lives of hundreds is hard to grasp. Learning about the history and culture of the French had taken its toll and it was time for me to relax and have a bite to eat.

(The mistake of the French draws parallels to Gamache's underestimation of the terrorists in Bury Your Dead. While he thought 6 agents were enough it was in fact not enough and is a mistake he struggles with internally throughout the novel)

As I exited the tour and started walking on the streets I came across to a café east of Rue St. Jean in Quebec City. The café is called Chez Temporel Café, and I sat sipping a cup of café au lait, (a milk beverage) while reading the local paper. It is not known by many tourists because its very secluded, which makes it a great spot to view an authentic Quebec styled restaurant, devoid of any tourist traps. After reading the current events while eating a Croissant aux Amandes (croissant pastry) I thought it was time to take a break and finally check in to my hotel.

As I arrived at the Chateau Frontenac I was greeted by the enormity of the hotel that essentially engulfed its surroundings. I checked in, lied down, and took in the experience of the events that transpired throughout the day. Upon waking up I freshened up and went down to the St-Laurent Bar and had some Caribou (French wine) and some French cuisine for dinner.

(St-Laurent bar is where Gamache meets Emile and the Champlain Society to talk about Chiniquy's journal and Champlain's Bible)

Once I had gotten back to my room I watched some television and called it a night.

There is so much culture and history its hard to get lost and overwhelmed when travelling here. There's only so much one can do in their own time frame and I would suggest making your own breakdown of exactly what you are going to do once you arrive. What intrigued me was the battlefields such as the Plains of Abraham and the almost unknown restaurant experiences for tourists located in the city such as the Chez Temporel Café. This is what interests me however and I would find what museums, events (Winter Carnival), and locations that pique your curiosity.

Upon my departure the next morning from the grand hotel I soaked in the atmosphere one more time and headed on a train to Montreal where I began another journey.

Advice Column

(text) = Context pertaining to the novel

Letter 1 (Gamache):

Dear Colin,

I am part of a homicide unit called the Surete du Quebec and there was this one case months ago that has really gotten to me. It started when one of my agents was captured and what we found out later was a plot by terrorists to destroy a dam. Long story short, one of my agents named

Agent Morin died when I promised him I would find him and keep him safe. I feel like I have not only failed him but have failed the badge and oath in which I serve under.

I say this because I underestimated the number of terrorists in the building we raided where Agent Morin was. I had thought 6 agents would be enough to save Morin but in doing that I not only got Morin killed but 3 other good officers died that day. If I had just thought about the extent of the situation more it could have helped. I knew that the terrorists were planning on destroying the dam so I should have realized they would have been heavily armed and were willing to lose lots of men in the process.

I guess I am having a hard time coming to terms with the damage I have done and how to move forward as an officer. That is why I have taken some time to recover and went to stay with a friend Emile in Quebec City.

Thanks, Gamache

Hello Gamache,

That sounds like an awful situation that you had to endure and I am sure it has taken its toll on your mental health. However, blaming yourself is not the way to go about these types of situations, especially for people such as yourself in law enforcement. You were under immense pressure trying to find your fellow agent and you must realize that you won't be able to save everyone.

That being said, friends and family are a vital support structure for you and talking to them about your feelings of that day can help you come to terms with the outcomes. You must let go of your suffering and hurt and find some way to help you do that.

(Tom tells Gamache that he is essentially imposing the suffering on himself and holding on to it tightly and suggests that he lets it go)

I hope that this advice helps and I hope you stay safe in your future endeavors.

Sincerely, Colin

Letter 2 (Old Munding):

Dear Colin,

Ever since I was young after my father had died (at least that's what I thought at the time) I have had this feeling that his suicide was really murder. It was a feeling that carried with me into my adult life. I had stumbled upon an old cane of my fathers and knew it had to of been stolen by his killer. I tracked him down and did the most unimaginable thing. I murdered him. It had to be done because he killed my father right?

Well it turns out that my father had faked his death and I actually murdered my own father. I covered it up and sent a good man to jail for 6 months. It is only now that the police have realized this and found out my actions. As I lay in my prison cell I cannot reconcile the actions I have taken and is why I am writing to you.

I realize my actions are very bad but how can I atone for my actions. I only wanted justice for my father and in trying to deliver justice it seems I only made matters worse.

Thanks, MUNDIN

Hello MUNDIN,

There is no worse action than taking the life of another person. However, you did what you did because you thought someone wronged your father. You did not kill for something greedy like money or fame. This should not be taken lightly. It is the kind of situation that deserves self-reflection and only then can you forgive yourself. Beating yourself over this action will only make matters worse.

(Greed and money is in reference to Olivier who was greedy and took the treasure from the Old Hermit in return for groceries)

I hope that you find some closure in your self-reflections and that you take care of yourself.
Sincerely, Colin

Comic Strip

Scene 1 - Agent Nichol is told to go back to her "basement" when she thinks she's a capable field agent. Her attitude seems to be why Gamache and other superiors treat her this way.

Scene 2: Inspector Beauvoir asks Agent Nichol for her help in regards to Agent Morin and the people responsible for kidnapping him. Nichol reluctantly helps the chief for fear she might get reprimanded.

Scene 3: Agent Nichol decides to release the footage of the raid to torment Gamache and have her revenge

Scene 4: Gornache relives the raid and beats himself up
